Transforming Religious Education in Schools Report Ofsted June 2010

This report evaluates the strengths and weaknesses of religious education (RE) in primary and secondary schools and discusses the key issues at the heart of RE teaching today. It is based principally on evidence from visits to 94 primary and 89 secondary schools in England between 2006 and 2009. The sample of schools represented a cross-section, including voluntary controlled schools, but did not include voluntary aided schools, for which there are separate inspection arrangements. The report builds on the findings of an earlier report, Making sense of religion. Age group: 4-18 Published: June 2010 Reference no: 090215 Page 1

The number of students taking GCSE and A-level examination courses in RE has risen substantially in the past 10 years. The total number of GCSE examination entries rose from about 110,000 in 1995 to about 400,000 in 2006. Of these, approximately 130,000 were for full course GCSE. More than half the Year 11 cohorts now gain a GCSE in religious studies, an unprecedented number and proportion. The number of pupils achieving an A-level qualification has more than doubled since 1996. Transforming religious education (No. 090215) page 5 Religious education in schools 2006 - 09

With Equality Act 2010, you may need to change some of your policies and practices.

Promoting equality and diversity and ensuring all your employees feel valued is vital in the modern workplace.

It makes good business sense too, as workers who feel valued are usually more productive and less likely to leave your employment.
